

Range Boundary Mapping

There are two levels of accuracy available for habitat mapping. For some species habitat maps were generated by combining existing location information with the 1:25,000 map sheets, for example, where there is a record of a species on a given map sheet that map sheet is included in the habitat mapping for the species. For the majority of species, existing location information, species habitat descriptions and available spatial data such as land tenure and land use information have been used to develop more detailed maps of potential habitat for each species. These habitat maps have been developed in collaboration with species specialists and give a more accurate indication of the actual and potential range of a species.

This information can be used in the assessment of proposed developments and to monitor impacts on species and species habitat. It is intended that the maps will be updated as and when new information becomes available.

The different feature types are defined below:

Known range (or actual range) is the area of land within the minimum convex polygon encompassing all known localities where the species is known to occur. It is the area within which the species is most likely to occur. This term is synonymous with 'extent of occurrence' as referred to in the Guidelines for eligibility for listing under the Tasmanian Threatened Species Protection Act 1995.

Core range encompasses the area, within the known range, known to support the highest densities of the species and/or thought to be of greatest importance for the maintenance of breeding populations of the species.

Potential range includes the known range, but also includes the area within which the species has not been found but may occur based on environmental conditions.

Habitat mapping has only been created for certain species and not every species has all range types available.
